

the vision of your marriage

WORKSHOP 1

At its best, marriage isn't about completing each other; it's about walking side by side on the journey to become independently joyful, together.

This workshop invites you to see the bigger picture – that your life's purpose isn't just survival or even worldly success, but evolution. In this light, marriage becomes one of the most powerful ways to grow, offering daily chances for both partners to support, challenge, and uplift each other. By the end, you'll start crafting a vision and mission for your marriage, both rooted in meaning rather than routine.

your relationship's big picture

Sanatana Dharma teaches that life's purpose is to evolve – to find a joy that doesn't depend on external things. It guides us to balance worldly and spiritual life, to see the world as the ground for spiritual growth rather than something to escape. Marriage supports this balance by uniting the practical, emotional, and spiritual sides of life.

In this tradition, marriage is called Vivāha ("special upliftment"). It balances four goals of life – Artha (material stability), Kāma (emotional fulfillment), Dharma (moral duty), and Moksha (spiritual liberation). When these align, marriage becomes a sacred partnership where both partners grow into their best selves.

Sanatana Dharma teaches that life's purpose is to evolve – to find a joy that doesn't depend on the outside. It guides us to balance worldly and spiritual life, to see the world as the ground for spiritual growth rather than something to escape. Marriage supports this balance by uniting the practical, emotional, and spiritual sides of life.

“Sanatana Dharma teaches that life's purpose is to evolve - to find a joy that doesn't depend on the outside.”

the way to grow is remembering purpose pulls performance

Clarity of purpose is the foundation of a sacred marriage. Without a shared “why,” a relationship can drift off course. Crafting a vision and mission together clarifies what you hope to receive and what you plan to give.

Your vision might be “our marriage is a sacred path where two individuals evolve together beyond personal desires,” and your mission might be “our marriage is a committed partnership where mutual support fosters personal and professional growth.”

These statements don't need to be perfect – they're simply anchors reminding you of the higher purpose you've chosen.

intentionality

the one virtue you should focus on this workshop

the sign you're growing you have less regrets, because you're doing your best

*here's one practice you should do with your partner

Begin by journaling your expectations for a fulfilling marriage.

Write just for yourself, and be honest about your hopes and fears.

Next, if you're engaged, imagine an ideal day in your future marriage and notice the feelings and details that make it special.

If you're already married, think back to your first meeting – what drew you together, and how have those qualities changed since then?

Finally, share your reflections with your partner.

Together, create a vision statement that covers your material, emotional, and spiritual goals. Remember: just by speaking and listening deeper, you're already shaping your marriage.

*this principle found in our scriptures

Bhagavan Krishna

The Shrimad Bhagavatam, an ancient scripture, describes the sacred union of Lord Krishna and Devi Rukmini as a living example of this vision in practice. Their relationship was loving and playful, yet grounded in responsibility. They managed the pressures of palace life, yet none of these burdens touched their inner joy. Each remained independently anchored while uplifting the other.

Their story shows that love isn't diminished by responsibility, and joy doesn't depend on ease. The Tenth Canto of the Bhagavatam recounts how Krishna and Rukmini stayed true to their sacred partnership even amid challenges. As we offer Divine References, we implore you to dive deeper into them on your own time.

common challenges you should reflect on

When you start seeing marriage as a path of growth, you might encounter doubts or resistance – maybe the idea of a “spiritual” approach feels too abstract or unnecessary. That quiet sense that something is missing can be unsettling, but often it’s a sign that you’re ready to go deeper.

Questions like this may come up:

What if my partner doesn't share this desire to grow?

If I keep growing, will we grow apart?

Will they still appreciate me if I change?

Start small: read or watch something together that sparks a discussion, then ask simple questions like “What gives you peace?” or “What legacy do we want to leave?” You don’t have to call it “spiritual” – you can still practice shared rituals like gratitude, mindful meals, or daily kindness. These little practices foster deeper growth.